bright [braɪt]
smart [smɑ:t]
clever ['klevə]
CEO (chief executive officer) [si:i:ˈəʊ]
ego ['i:gəʊ]

bright//smart//clever-

Bright, smart and clever are synonyms. We use them to describe people who are able to learn quickly. A smart person also knows how to make good choices and decisions. Clever can be used for people who understand things quickly. We often use clever with children.

If I told you the world was coming to an end in 2012, would I be saying that the world's future looked bright?

No, if you told us the world was coming to an end in 2012, you wouldn't be saying that the world's future looked bright.

What kind of people always try to look on the bright side of things?

Optimists always try to look on the bright side of things.

Who, in your opinion, is the brightest politician in your country?

In my opinion John Smith is the brightest politician in my country.

Why? Because he can always surprise me with a clever response.

If you were a CEO of a company suffering from a temporary crisis, who do you think would be able to advise you on a smart business move?

If I were a CEO of a company suffering from a temporary crisis, I think Donald Trump would be able to advise me on a smart business move.

Give me a clever solution for:
a) a person smoking in my presence
b) a bossy workmate
c) a child who fears monsters.

A clever solution for a child who fears monsters would be to tell them monsters are weak and fear children even more.

Do you think it naturally follows that smart people have big egos?

No, I don't think it naturally follows that smart people have big egos.

Should a smart soldier accept orders of a dumb officer?
What would be the results?

I think every soldier must accept orders, even from dumb officers.

The results could be damaging. For example, they can lose in battle.